Writing in the Deutscher Weckruf und Beobachter, staunch champion of Hitlerism, Kuhn listed among objectives of the bund a ban against inter-racial marriages and recovery of "true proportionate representation in the vital fields of influence for the hundred million Aryan Americans . . . being subjected to the dictatorship of a small racially alien minority."

At his arraignment Hauck maintained that he was merely the manager of a hotel and restaurant at Camp Siegfried, despite the fact that an application filed with the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board lists him as the owner.

Those named with Hauck are Ernest Mueller of 2152 Himrod St., president of the corporation, and described in the Congressional Record as an American citizen active in boycotting Jews; Addo Bielefeld of 2697 Heath Ave., the Bronx; Henry Wolfgang of 1713 Stephen Ave.; Bruno Haehnel of 301 Reid Ave., and Herman Schwarzman of 344 Starr St.

Violation of the law, an indictable misdemeanor, involves a maximum penalty of a $5,000 fine and a year in prison for individuals, and a $10,000 fine for corporations.

Situated on a 50-acre plot formerly part of Camp Upton, Camp Siegfried is considered the largest pro-Nazi institution in America, used by more than 25,000 men, women and children for parades, camping, listening to speeches in praise of Hitler and receiving military instruction.

According to records, Mrs. Elsie

Kremer of 420 Menahan St. purchased the land for $8,000 on May 14, 1936, from Henry E. M. and James E. Commes, brothers, of Yaphank, and sold the property on Aug. 6, 1936, for "$1 and other good and valuable considerations" to Mueller and Otto Beigraben of 267 E. 74th St., Manhattan, both listed as trustees of the German-American Bund.

Mueller and Beigraben, in turn, sold it on May 10, 1937, also for "$1 and other good and valuable considerations," to the German-American Settlement League, Inc., which operates other camps at Babylon, Lindenhurst, Southbury, Conn., and Andover, N. J.
