Newspapers by ancestry
https://newscomwc.newspapers.com/image/827315882/

FOUR—CLINTON (Okla.) DAILY NEWS, TUESDAY, DEC. 21, 1937.

More than 28,000 persons read the Daily News and Chronicle regular

The Clinton Daily News

Published Sunday Morning and Daily Evenings except Saturday at 708 Frisco avenue, Clinton, Okla., and entered as second class

Established as a Daily July 13, 1927. The Custer County mail matter under the act of March 3, 1879. P. O. Box 811. Chronicle, Weekly edition, established May 15, 1899.

Buff B. Buttis, Editor and Owner
Davis Punderburk, Managing Editor — Paul Leach, News Editor
Lee Roy Knight Advertising

MEMBER ASSOCIATED PRESS
The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for publication of all news dispatches credited to it or not otherwise credited in this paper and also the local news therein.

Member of the National Editorial Association and the Oklahoma Press Association. Served by the United Press Association, the Associated Press, the United Features, and NEA Features.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES

Carrier Boy Delivery, per week 10c
One Year in Advance, City of Clinton $5.00
One year in Advance, Rural by mail in Custer, Washita, Dewey and adjoining counties. ($3.25—tax 26?) $4.00

Other subscription rates gladly given upon request.
Advertising sold separately or in combination with the weekly Chronicle.
OFFICE PHONE 1-0-6-5

Oklahoma PRESS ASSOCIATION

SETTING THE BRAKE ON ALIEN MEDDLING

The New England town meeting is one of the oldest existing vehicles of democracy—as old as the United States government itself.

So when a New England town meeting comes into head-on collision with the ultra-modern phenomenon of Nazism, what happens ought to be worth watching.

It happened, the other day—in Southbury, Conn. The German-American Bund, a Nazi outfit, had bought 178 acres of land within the town limits of Southbury, and was preparing to build a camp there. The sturdy Yankee of Southbury had scant use for such goings-on, and cast about for a way to stop it. Hence the town meeting.

The townspeople debated the matter for a couple of hours or so. On the one hand, they faced the fact that this is a free country and that there is no law to keep a private organization from maintaining a summer camp if it chooses to do so; on the other hand, there was the equally obvious fact that Yankee democracy has no use whatever for a goose-stepping, heil-Hitlerling Nazi outfit in its midst.

In the end, the townspeople adopted a zoning ordinance making it illegal for the Nazis to build cabins or hold drills on their land. And there the matter rests, with the Nazis apparently checkmated.

* * *

Now Southbury is a small town, and what happens there may not seems to be of very great moment as far as capitals like Washington and Berlin are concerned. But there was a good deal of significance in this town meeting, for it grappled with a problem that is peculiarly difficult for Americans to handle—as well as increasingly important.

That problem has to do with the treatment which we are to give to semi-political organizations, inspired by foreign propagandists and aiming ultimately at the complete denial of everything we understand by Americanism. The Nazis are one such group; the Communists are another. Each looks forward to the abolition of democracy, each scoffs at freedom—and yet each is quick to take advantage of our democratic freedom in order to carry on its program in our midst.

What are we to do in such cases? Our laws guaranteeing freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, and so on, are extremely precious to us. Yet it is not pleasant to see those laws used as a protective cloak by the very people who would immediately destroy them if they should get in power.

* * *

The Yankee ingenuity of the Southbury town meeting found one answer. A zoning ordinance may be a queer weapon with which to fight a potential dictatorship, but apparently it is going to do the job the Southbury people want it to do.

A more comprehensive answer is needed, however. We have a right to protect ourselves. Evolving a method of applying that protection within the framework of our free institutions calls for some earnest thinking.

MEMORY LANE

NINE YEARS AGO

December, 21, 1928

C. J. Calmes is spending the week-end in Oklahoma City. T. J. Harris, who is employed with the Rainey Davis Merchantile company, of Pratt, Kans., will spend the Christmas holidays in Clinton, visiting his family.

Miss Vera Cooper and Mr. and Mrs. Nolan Bell will spend the week-end in Oklahoma City.

Miss Marie Harris, who is employed as a teacher at Fay, Okla., will spend the Christmas holidays in Clinton with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Harris.

The epidemic of influenza that spread through the city of Clinton and neighboring territory like wildfire several weeks ago, reached the peak of its progress last week, and is now definitely on the wane, local physicians expressed Friday morning.

DAILY NEWS WANT-ADS GET RESULTS

GRIN AND BEAR IT — By LICHTY

it a that awful Smith dog howling again. We simply must have a baby and give them a taste of their own medicine!

BEHIND THE SCENES IN WASHINGTON

BY RODNEY DUTCHER

BY RODNEY DUTCHER
NEA Service Staff Correspondent

WASHINGTON.—More than 1,500,000 persons have lost their jobs since Labor Day and about 1,700,000 have had their working hours—and hence their purchasing power—curtailed.

At least 2,475,000 persons who were at work in August will be out of work by the third week in January.

These secret estimates as to the effect of the current business recession on employment have been carefully worked out by some of the government's foremost economists and statisticians.

Officially, of cours., it is stated that there's no way of telling the amount of new unemployment. Actually, there has been some real effort to find out where the country stands and what relief needs may amount to next winter and spring.

Indications are that 950,000 persons have been laid off by factories since the beginning of September, about 275,000 in the construction industry and around 210,000 in the transportation and mining industries. That adds up to 1,435,000 and, if the figures are approximately correct, there are other jobless in addition.

The estimated 1,700,000 whose employment has been cut down to two, three or four days a week are an important factor in the business situation because the resultant decline in purchasing power accentuates the present downward spiral.

More layoffs are anticipated after Christmas. Many now working in the retail, wholesale and mail order trade will be released. Others now working part-time in industry are expected to go off payroll entirely. Some employers who have deliberately refrained from pre-Christmas layoffs will finally break the news. And by the middle of January, it's computed, agricultural unemployment—largely seasonal—will have reached 450,000.

The previously cited estimate of 2,475,000 may be conservative. Some government economists believe that the number of "new unemployed" will reach 3,000,000 by the middle of January.

The federal unemployment census directed by John D. Biggers was taken right in the middle of the September-January period and consequently will reflect only partially the effect of the business slump.

Accuracy of this count will depend largely on the care with which questionnaire replies are checked as to whether they report actual unemployment.

* * *

BY the first of the year, WPA rolls will be carrying nearly 2,060,000 persons and will reach the peak limit which Administrator Harry Hopkins says is possible under the 1937-38 appropriation of $1,500,000,000. A new appropriation of $1,300,000,000, it now appears, WPA employment is now about 1,575,000 and is increasing rapidly as 350,000 more persons begin to be added to the rolls.

Congressmen returning from the holidays are expected to increase the pressure already begun by some of them for an additional WPA appropriation. The degree of this pressure is likely to be conditioned by the speed or lag with which the increase in unemployment is reflected on local relief rolls, and the extent to which unemployment insurance systems in nearly half the states serve to keep the "new unemployed" off those rolls.

Copyright, 1937, NEA Service, Inc.

THIS CURIOUS WORLD — By William Ferguson

TUBERCULOSIS attacks different races in different ways. American Indians, on leaving the outdoor life to which they are accustomed, and moving to congested cities, are viciously susceptible to the disease.

KELLOGG SAID TO BE BETTER

ST. PAUL, Minn., Dec. 21.—(AP)—Dr. J. A. Lepak, said Frank B. Kellogg, co-author of the Kellogg-Briand peace pact, critically ill at his home here with pneumonia, had rallied today.

The physician said spread of the congestion had been halted and that his heart action was better. He held out "virtually no hope" for recovery, however.

Kellogg, an internationally known diplomat, is a former ambassador to Great Britain, world court judge and secretary of state.

Daily News PARADE

Highway Patrolman Roy Russell arrested a drunk driver the other day. When ordinary method of persuasion failed to gain his release, the drunk confided in Patrolman Russell that he was going to see Governor Marland.

"I'll have him appoint me inspector of the patrol," said the man under arrest. "Then you'll be sorry. I'll sure get your uniform."

Patrolman Russell was not alarmed, however, for that is one of the favorite lines of arrestment with the drivers. And threats never help a bit.

* * *

When Chairman Lea M. Nichols of the state board of affairs announced the ouster of Dr. J. A. Land as sanatorium superintendent, he told reporters "I think the less said of this the better."

We disagree.

We think it should be publicized sufficiently to impress upon the legislators who are responsible that frequent changes in the administration of the sanatorium is very definitely a poor policy.

We think, and have thought all alone, that the board should select a capable man to head the institution, and leave him there.

Changing a superintendent after only two months, as has been done in the Dr. Land case, is almost the last straw.

We hope the appointee—Dr. W. C. Tisdal—is permanent.

NEW YORK INSIDE OUT

NEW YORK, Dec. 21.—Movie stars who come to New York for a "vacation" really stroll in enough business during their stay to stymie a big corporation executive. Joan Crawford, now installed at the Waldorf, has three secretaries when to help sade through the endless details she must transact.

As a matter of fact, you never see a film star in Manhattan who doesn't have at least two publicity agents constantly at her side, especially when free from place to place with the remorseless precision of a railroad time-table. I once happened to get into a heated discussion with Phil Wray over the merits of a current Broadway drama. It was in a private reception room at the Hotel Gotham, and for a moment we forgot the professional interview which had been the original starting point. Just when the argument got interesting, two firm-handed film representatives hustled Miss Wray into my cozy with a reminder that she was due at another spot in ten minutes. She had to chop off a sentence in the middle as she disappeared through the elevator door. What with shopping, meeting managers, posing for newsmen, wrangling with agents and quarreling at the proper night clubs, the New York "celebration" is a nightmare. Karen Morley once told me that only the valiest stars looked on these visits without real dread.

* *

NYAWKERS

Big Snapshots: Ira Gershwin arguing vociferously with the manager of the swanky Central Park West apartment house where he lives. Ira was threatened only the other day with a dispossess notice because he keeps playing the piano after 11 o'clock. Neighbors complain they like Ira's stuff in the movies, but not when they want to sleep.... Former Mayor Jimmie Walker buying a ticket at a Broadway newsstand. Walker holds up the line while he chats with the cashier about farm life.... Elmer Rice filing sediments into the jury box at a murder trial last week in Supreme Court. Rice won fame as a playwright with his first opus, "On Trial," a courtroom drama. He himself started out as a criminal lawyer.... Joseph Hofleta, world-famous violin virtuoso, drawing lots of craned necks from the crowd in La Conga the other night. Hofleta sits dutifully near one of the orchestra players and takes a lesson on how to play the maracas. A Cuban rattle.... Eve Symington, the social registerite who warbles nightly in the Waldorf Astoria Sert Room, clapping her hand over her mouth at a Madison Square Garden hockey game. Eve and her husband are enthusiastic hockey fans, but she can't risk spoiling her voice by yelling during the exciting rallies.

* *

IMPROMPTUS

Ether Echoes: Fred Allen's original name was Sullivan. As a lad he thought Smith was the most common name in the country; but while working as a runner in the Boston Public Library he discovered that the city directory listed 43 more Sullivans than Smiths.... With so many in town, Fred thought he'd better change.... to Fred St. James. There was several more changes before he finally assumed the Allen tag.... Incidentally, Fred cannot type, and so he writes all his scripts out by hand with electric speed. His handwriting is so microscopic in size that nobody can read it, perhaps except himself.... All cast members of the "Aunt Jemima" show drop a quarter into the kitty every time they muff a cue or miss a line. The proceeds go to the Christmas fund for poor children.... Sound effect imitations of Jack Benny trying to start his old Maxwell are done by Pinto Colvig, aided by the south end of a slim horn. Colvig was once a character actor at Walt Disney's Silly Symphony studio.... Geo. Hirschfeld takes umbrage at the "Song Shop" not during rehearsals—time drives them rub-rusty because he won't show them the pictures later, the meanie!

BARBS

IT'S only after the battle's over and the home town has put up his statue in the library that a man realizes fame is just a bust.

* * *

Japan's attention to Nanking contained, it is reliably reported, the threat to maintain Far East peace at any price.

* * *

School children are getting wise. A midwest teacher asked where The Hague is located and one bright urchin shouted "New Jersey."

* * *

Russian parachute practice is carried on under the theory that everyone is the nation is just two jumps from a big war.

* * *

An oldtimer in Philadelphia has been caught yearning for the old days when good five-cent cigars were a dime a dozen.

(C)opyright, 1937, NEA Service, Inc.

MILL SECTION SUFFERS LOSS

TSINGTAO, China, Dec. 20.—(U.P.)—Renewal of a wave of looting, dynamiting and burning which caused $10,000,000 loss in the Japanese mill section was feared tonight.

Acting on the orders of the state department of Washington, the U. S. second warned all American to evacuate quickly although American flags and property have not been endangered. Some Americans have left for Shanghai but the majority are determined to stay.

The new economic issue of the Chinese government at Hankow was blamed by some observers for the terrorism here. They pointed out that three financial experts appointed members of the national military council, Chinese military power.

They believed that the economics usually subject to an entirely new Chinese war party, which aggressive counter offensive policy including the blowing up of Japanese property throughout China, will be pursued.

It is a good habit to read the Clinton Daily News.

TOO MANY Fiancees — by KATHRYN CULVER

Copr. 1937 by United Feature Syndicate, Inc.

Guy Garrison's millionaire Uncle Sherman, irascible invalid, is so insistent upon his getting married that Guy, while cruising in Miami, sends the old man a photo of Joan Wilson, night-club singer, saying he is engaged to her. Then, he actually becomes engaged to Mabel Lane but, when Uncle Sherman comes to Miami to take him and Joan on a yacht cruise, Guy is afraid to spring a new fiancee on him. He pays Joan to go on the cruise as his "fiancee." Ned Acton, who loves Joan and is opposed to the scheme, gets aboard the yacht as a member of the crew. Also aboard are Dick Young, private detective, and Laura Shiller, pretty trained nurse. At Havana, Ned mysteriously skips. That evening, while the yacht party is at the gambling Casino, Laura is decoyed away from the others by an anonymous note. A strange Cuban kidnaps her and takes her to a deserted house, where he locks her in an upstairs room.

CHAPTER XXIV

LAURA'S first impule on being left a prisoner in the huge, high-ceilinged room, was to scream hysterically, but she gritted her teeth to repress the impulse. Instinctively, she knew that screams would do her no good. Her captor would not have left her ungagged if there was any chance that anyone would pay any attention to cries for help.

She sank into a deep armchair trying to fight off the hideous fear that threatens to engulf her. Someone would come soon. The Cuban had indicated as much. She must steel herself for the meeting.

Who would come? And what did they intend to do with her?

She rose nervously and went to a front window. It was one-foot-ironed, with a heavy wooden frame and small leaded panes of glass. Outside, were horizontal iron bars imbedded in the solid masonry.

The window came open as she struggled with it. A blast of cool air whipped into the room, refreshing her fevered brow.

She grasped one of the iron bars and shook it frantically. It was as solid as the house itself. Pressing her forehead against the cold metal she could look down into the street, and could see the houses on either side of her prison.

The street was dark and deserted. The houses on each side were a good hundred feet away and not a glimmer of light showed in either of them.

SHE turned away from the window. A careful tour of the room convinced her that there was no possible excape except by the door—and it was solid oak, without even a transom above. The walls were solid, and there was not even a closet to give hope of another exit. No skylight in the ceiling and no rugs on the floor to conceal a possible trapdoor.

The room's furnishings were a queer mingling of the ancient and the modern. The house must be very old, Laura thought with its high ceilings and the beamed arches between the front windows. There was a beautiful cut-glass chandelier suspended from the ceiling with holders for two dozen candles, but an ugly bare electric bulb had supersceded candles for illumination.

A silk-covered divan was placed invitingly in the alcove, an intruding note of modernity among the high-backed, carved chairs and the antique chest of drawers with the patina of age upon its rubbed surface.

Laura went to the divan and sat down stiffly, staring at the locked door with brooding eyes. The knob would not turn, and the door would open inward.

Hysteria threatened to overwhelm her upon her again. She resolutely turned her eyes from the door, forced herself to think about the gay party she had left at Casino.

WHAT had they thought of her disappearance? How long would they wait before instituting a search for her? She little knew of the spurious message that had been delivered to them. She serenely confident that Dick would not return to the yacht without her.

She realized that most of Diantha's were of Dick. A wave of slow replaced the chill of hysteria as she said his name softly aloud.

There had all been mistakes. Some aboard the Nirvana, who had played her role by pretense to ignore Dick's advances. But had been difficult. From the moment of meeting him, she had been acutely aware of his interest in her—and of her awakening interest in him.

She hadn't allowed herself to do much thinking about it while aboard the yacht. There, she had her work to do. Mr. Garrison had been a trying patient. His care had left her little time for personal affairs.

She sighed forlornly, and suddenly realized that she was thinking about it all as though it were a part of the past. For the first time, she faced the realization that she might never seen any of the yacht party again!

The others didn't matter much, not seeing Dick again matter terribly. Mr. Garrison would get along without her—much better, without her, she told herself bitterly. She envisioned him defiantly smoking a cigar and taking a cocktail. She knew any such excesses might snap the tender thread that held him to life but, in her heart, she felt he might be better for so that way.

She felt so removed from it all, though it were a part of her life that was dead. She tried to shake the morbid fancy away from her.

SHE jumped up and began to pace the floor wondering how much longer she could endure the torture of waiting — how much longer she would have to endure it.

At the sound of an approaching car in the street, she ran to the window, hoping frantically that she might make herself heard. She then clung to the bars with the hope gone as the automobile drove on in front of the house and stopped.

One man got out, walked briskly up the walk. Laura heard the front door open and close. There was a brief interlude of silence, then the tread of heavy feet on the stairs.

She drew back fearfully crouched in a corner, her lips dry, her heart sounding furiously. A key grated in the lock — the knob turned, and the door swung inward.

For a moment, she didn't recognize the man who stood in the doorway his eyes searching the room. She didn't recognize him until a bellow of astonished relief burst from his lips:

"What the devil are you doing here!"

(To be continued)
(The characters in this serial are fictitious.)

Copyright © 2025 Newspapers.com. All Rights Reserved.